PARIS, FRANCE

MARY KATHERINE SCHREIBER

Program: Institut d'Etudes Politiques Exchange, Spring

Academic Life: The classroom experience in Paris was very different than classes here at UW, and it definitely took some getting used to. Most of my classmates were international students; however, there were a few native French students in almost all of my classes. At Sciences Po, I took classes that ranged from gender and development, to economics, to sociology and even a course on foreign policy under the Obama Administration! Most of my professors and TAs were French, and my sociology professor was Italian. It was interesting to learn a subject from someone whose cultural background is much different than my own. I feel as though this aspect added greatly to my academic experience abroad, and I feel fortunate to have been able to attend lectures lead by such distinguished professionals from across the world.

Advice for Someone Considering this Program: I chose to attend the Institut d'études politiques de Paris because I knew this program would best contribute to my personal path to academic and professional success. The independence offered within the program also played an integral role in my decision to attend Sciences Po. This particular program granted me with the opportunity to attend upper-level courses in areas such as economics, political science, and sociology alongside international and native French speaking students. This challenged me to not only confine my personal engagements to other students from the University of Wisconsin and served as motivation for me to surround myself with other French students in order to further advance my French speaking abilities. I would highly recommend this program to any student who is interested in pursuing a career in the Social Sciences, and who is looking for a study abroad experience that is both intellectually challenging and personally rewarding.

“The exchange program at the Institut d'études politiques de Paris corresponded perfectly to my interests.”

Mary Katherine taking a stroll along the Seine River.

Program: Institut d'Etudes Politiques Exchange, Spring

Academic Life: The classroom experience in Paris was very different than classes here at UW, and it definitely took some getting used to. Most of my classmates were international students; however, there were a few native French students in almost all of my classes. At Sciences Po, I took classes that ranged from gender and development, to economics, to sociology and even a course on foreign policy under the Obama Administration! Most of my professors and TAs were French, and my sociology professor was Italian. It was interesting to learn a subject from someone whose cultural background is much different than my own. I feel as though this aspect added greatly to my academic experience abroad, and I feel fortunate to have been able to attend lectures lead by such distinguished professionals from across the world.

Advice for Someone Considering this Program: I chose to attend the Institut d'études politiques de Paris because I knew this program would best contribute to my personal path to academic and professional success. The independence offered within the program also played an integral role in my decision to attend Sciences Po. This particular program granted me with the opportunity to attend upper-level courses in areas such as economics, political science, and sociology alongside international and native French speaking students. This challenged me to not only confine my personal engagements to other students from the University of Wisconsin and served as motivation for me to surround myself with other French students in order to further advance my French speaking abilities. I would highly recommend this program to any student who is interested in pursuing a career in the Social Sciences, and who is looking for a study abroad experience that is both intellectually challenging and personally rewarding.

“The exchange program at the Institut d'études politiques de Paris corresponded perfectly to my interests.”

Mary Katherine taking a stroll along the Seine River.